“The Attachment”

By Ailsa Piper and Tony Doherty

In a small tribe on the west coast of Africa there is a lovely tradition.

When a woman is to give birth, the other women of the village take her out into the wilderness and together they pray, meditate and listen intently until they detect the song of the unborn child.

This small, unsophisticated and remote tribe holds the belief that the genius of every soul is in its vibration, which expresses its own unique identity. Indeed each soul has its own song. We all have our own song.

When the women hear the song of the unborn child they sing it out loud, then return to the village and teach it to everyone in the village. When the child is born, the entire village gathers and sings the child’s song. The first sound that the new-born child experiences is its own song.

Later, when the child goes to school, the village gathers to sing the child’s song. Their celebration of marriage has the man singing the woman’s song and the woman replying with the son of the man. It is then they are married. When the person comes to death, the village gathers again to sing the song.

Why does a person capture our heart or mind?

Their answer we are irresistibly drawn to those people whose song we hear. Friendship and love have much to do with recognising the particular song within the mystery of the other person. We hear their music.
